Overview

This Request for Ideas (RFI) seeks to identify organizations interested in implementing intergenerational programs in Central Texas. Funds can be used to launch new or expand existing intergenerational models that engage older adults to come together with younger generations to share skills, needs, and experiences with each other while also addressing critical community issues.

This RFI will allow organizations to submit a short one-page description of their program idea and an accompanying outline of the budget.

Projects eligible for funding under this RFI will fall into one of two categories:

- Tier One – Innovation Grants: These grants are for organizations who would like to implement intergenerational work to address any identified community issue. These grants will not require full-time staffing to carry out the intervention. The grant may include but not be limited to initial research, needs assessments, site visits to innovative intergenerational programs, project planning, marketing, programmatic costs, support for volunteers, and staff time. These smaller grants will provide one-time funding, for a 24-month period. Follow-up funding after the two-year grant period is not guaranteed, but may be considered. Maximum award per applicant: Up to $20,000 per year for 2 years.

- Tier Two – Strategic Grants: These larger grants are prioritized for organizations who would like to implement intergenerational work focusing on engaging older adults to support early childhood brain development, mitigate toxic stress experienced by low-income families with children, and/or for a project based in a rural community. These grants can cover the same expenses as listed above, but are expected to have a deeper programmatic component and thus may require more staff time or programmatic expenses. These larger grants will be one-time funding for 24-months. Subsequent funding is not guaranteed, but may be invited for ongoing re-procurement. Maximum award per applicant: Up to $100,000 per year for 2 years.

St. David’s Foundation only expects to award a limited number of Tier Two grants. A larger number of Tier One grants will be awarded. Applications for Tier Two Grants will be much more competitive than Tier One applications.

Rationale for Intergenerational Programs

Today there are roughly 200,000 people aged 65 or older living in the Foundation’s five-county Central Texas area (Bastrop, Caldwell, Hays, Travis, and Williamson Counties). By 2050, that number will quadruple to over 800,000.¹ As this population grows, more older adults will be seeking ways to remain productive and connected to their communities. At the same time, younger generations can benefit greatly through the support, stimulation, and mentorship that older adults can provide. Indeed, a critical element of successful intergenerational programming is the concept of reciprocity – that older adults and youth serve as resources to one another. All of this points to the need for innovative and creative strategies to bring different age groups together in purposeful, mutually beneficial activities that can improve community cohesion, improve child well-being, and promote healthy outcomes for all ages.

Over three decades of research has led to compelling evidence of the effectiveness of intergenerational programs. We have learned that these programs can address specific targeted concerns, such as low literacy and caregiver stress, but also have broader personal impacts among individuals who participate, including reduced social isolation and improved self-esteem. Below are some key findings that demonstrate the impact of this work.²

Older Adults participating in intergenerational programs report:
- Enhanced life satisfaction (Fisher, 1995)
- Decreased social isolation (Bressler, 2001), (Short-De Graff & Diamond, 2006)
- Increased physical, cognitive, and social activity (Freid et. al., 2004)
- Fulfillment and a sense of meaning in one’s life (Larkin, 2002)
- Belief that their knowledge and experiences are valued by others (Bressler, Henkin & Jackson, 2004)
- Development of new, meaningful relationships (Taylor and Bessler, 2000)
- Learned new skills (Rinck, Naragon, & St. Clair, 1995)
- Gained new insights about young people (Rinck, Naragon, & St. Clair, 1995)

Children and Youth participating in intergenerational programs report:
- Improved self-esteem and self-worth (LoSciuto et. al., 1996)
- Improved behavior (Newman, Morris & Streetman, 1999)
- Increase involvement in schoolwork (Brabazon, 1999)
- Improved academic performance (Turnbull & Smith, 2004)
- Greater levels of empathy, social acceptance and ability to self-regulate (Femia et. al., 2007)
- Higher personal/social developmental scores (Rosebrook, 2006)
- Enhanced perceptions of older adults, persons with disabilities and nursing homes in general (Heyman et. al. 2011)
- Social and emotional growth, including a deepened understanding of aging, older adults and dementia (Galbreith et. al. 2015)
- Social and emotional competencies, such as empathy, patience and problem-solving (Holmes, 2009)

Families participating in intergenerational programs report:
- Being connected to dependable support systems (Osborne & Bulluck, 2000), (Power & Maluccio, 1999), (Rinck & Hunt, 1997)
- Increased sense of self-confidence and self-efficacy in parenting (Bridge Meadows, 2016)
- The vast majority of parents believing that the intergenerational program is beneficial for their children (Jarrott & Bruno, 2007).

Examples of Program Models

Intergenerational Programs bring older and younger age-groups together to address a particular social issue – there is almost no limit to what programs can address. In some cases, the need focuses on youth, with older adults providing a service to address that need. In other cases, the roles are reversed by youth addressing a need facing older adults. In either case, reciprocity exists through the value of either giving or receiving a service and engaging with the other generation. In some cases, a shared site or shared activity can address needs of both age groups. This distinction allows us to categorize programs into one of three classifications:

1. Older Adults in Service to Youth and Families
2. Youth in Service to Older Adults
3. Young and Old in Collaboration

Within each classification, there are extensive examples of what programs can look like. The examples listed below are illustrative cases to help build understanding of the program framework, but are not an exhaustive list of potential intergenerational program objectives.

Older Adults in Service to Youth and Families

- Supporting early childhood development in child care
- Supporting children living in the foster care system
- Supporting children who have a parent incarcerated
- Supporting “grandfamilies” who have stepped up to care for children when parents are unable to do so
- Helping provide afterschool care for working families
- Supporting literacy in schools through reading programs
- Working with immigrant students to build fluency in English
- Mentoring adjudicated youth within the juvenile justice system
- Working with teen parents to support their employment, education, and childcare and parenting skills

Youth in Service to Older Adults

- Matching young volunteers with older, homebound adults for ongoing friendly visits, or basic home maintenance and safety checks
- Recruiting college-age students to offer respite care for families caring for elderly members
- Tapping young adult volunteers to provide car rides for older adults in need of transportation
- Engaging youth in food preparation, meal delivery and congregate meal programs
- Enlisting youth in teaching computer literacy programs for older adults and providing hands-on assistance with smart phones, tablets and other devices

Young and Old in Collaboration

- Co-locating a pre-school or daycare facility with a senior activity center or other aging services facility
- Offering affordable housing for college students by being a housemate with an older adult or living in a senior living facility
- Implementing workforce development programs that foster an exchange of expertise between generations
- Developing arts-based programming that allows all ages to engage in a creative process together
- Coordinating oral history projects where young students learn about an older adult’s lived experience and document it as part of their education
- Engaging in a community service project together (such as a community garden, a community needs assessment, or an environmental monitoring program)
